If the ever-increasing complexity of modern life can be summed up in the acronym SHIT, then the advent of robotization can be viewed as the ultimate expression of this unutterable truth. In the modern world, everyday things are increasingly automated and dominated by the application of digital technology to all aspects of life. While the UN has never quite developed a definition of what a robot is, one of the most common is a machine that can perform tasks automatically, at a cost far less than a human. For a machine to be fully classified as a robot, it should be autonomous, meaning it can accomplish all of its functions without external intervention. The robotic revolution, however, is taking place far beyond the realms of science fiction, with modern robots being constructed across the industrial spectrum. Whether in manufacturing, heavy industry, agriculture, or for domestic usage, robots have the potential to free mankind from the confines of monotonous physical labor. Robotic technology is already used in many industries across the world, and manufacturers worldwide are investing billions of dollars in development to compete in a market that is set to explode in the future. The global robotics market is estimated to be worth $77 billion by 2016, up from an estimated $22 billion in 2010. And it's not only big businesses that are investing. Many industrialists in developing countries are embracing robotics technology, looking to avoid the high costs of labor and importation. In the near future, these developments could lead to a future of labor-intensive activities being conducted entirely by machines, with robots dominating all fields of human endeavor, from healthcare to retail to leisure. Aware of the potential dangers of abandoning manual labor to robots, some people worry that the advances in robotics could spell the end of the human race. The truth is, there is no need to fear a robot takeover. Instead, robotics represents a massive opportunity to free humanity from what has become an anachronism. As societies worldwide are liberated from the need for physical labor, they can harness their creative potential in far more constructive and uplifting ways. --- This is a free screensaver, you can
