AGi32, a program that can simulate light emitting sources and facilitate the development and optimization of lighting solutions was first released in 2014.AGi32 was always intended to be a standalone lighting simulator that is not an electric workstation.Real benefits to use this tool in practice are a result of its increasing functionality and aesthetic improvements.In the past, one could only create a lighting solution, run it and see the light output in a static model.You could even change the color of the light source and see how the change affected the final light output, but you couldn't simulate the lighting output in any way because you couldn't create a dynamic model.AGi32 was limited.For all new light sources, the user needed to spend some time calculating the optimal position and orientation.The position of the light source (relative to the surface) can have a huge effect on the quality and dynamics of the lighting solution.This can result in a light source that is far from optimal having a higher dynamic range.You may need a light source that is positioned slightly closer to the surface at which it is shining if it is not shining directly into the brightest part of the room or the light source is not strong enough to illuminate the entire room.
