Another aspect where Photoshop Elements 21 is lagging behind the competition (and even the superior Elements 20) is in its RAW Converter. It is really a step back from its predecessor, as its predecessor made quality comparisons and even had a built-in RAW converter (that I used to help test and review it), but the current feature is simply not there. Hopefully that will change in a future version. Now that CC2019 is out (and present in the app store), you can run the uninstaller and uninstall your version of Lightroom (It will show a message telling you that it will run your CC) You must, however, be careful when using the CC2019 uninstaller to make sure you don't uninstall everything else. I keep on finding photos that aren't in the Library but when I use the CC2019 uninstaller, it says that they are in the Library but they aren't even present in the Library view, which is strange. PS: We have our trouble too, as we have upgraded from a Mac Pro to a 2018 Mac Pro with an SSD, 4Gb 4133. The problem reported here is shared with users who have an SSD. We installed the Adobe CC2019 and everything went smooth until the unzipping. In fact, it's now easier to import not only JPEG images but also EXR, PSD, TIFF, and XMP images. Importing them is as simple as choosing them from the selection window provided by the Preview view, and then clicking Import. When you open the modified images the raw lightbox appears, ready for you to start editing. New vector masks, workflow tools, simulated Lightroom metadata, and additional Photoshop commands for filters and the Liquify Tool are added. These bring important new features to Photoshop, helping you work more easily with your images.
